Bubbles

White Bubbles

Champagne, France

Champagne production (méthode Champenoise) is a labor-intensive process where a secondary fermentation inside the bottle creates bubbles. This occurs when a liqueur de tirage (a wine solution of sugar and yeast) is added to a bottle of still base wine, creating fermentation inside the bottle which produces both carbon dioxide lees (spent yeast). Lees are collected, removed from the bottle, and replaced with a solution of wine and sugar, giving the sparkling wine its sweetness.

Crémant, France

Crémant is a group of sparkling wines made with a technique similar to Champagne, but from outside the Champagne region in eight different appellations throughout France (and in neighboring Luxembourg). Crémant is a high-quality choice without the price tag of classic Champagne.

Italy

Prosecco uses the Martinotti/Charmat method, where the wine, together with yeasts and sugar, are put in large containers that keep the pressure constant and controlled temperature, allowing for the production of bubbles. The Franciacorta DOCG is produced using the traditional method, where secondary fermentation takes place in the individual bottles in a similar manner as champagne.

Spain

Cava is the popular sparkling wine of Spain, and one of Spain's most famous wines. The name cava comes from the Spanish word for "cave," referring to the cellars where the wines age. To be called Cava, the wine must come from the Cava Denominación de Origen (DO) area and must be carbonated with a secondary fermentation in bottle.

California, U.S.

California's sparkling wine history can be traced back to Sonoma County and the Korbel brothers, who started producing Korbel California Champagne in the Redwoods of Russian River Valley in 1882. In 1965, Jack and Jamie Davies bought the historic and dilapidated Schramsberg Winery in Calistoga with the goal of making sparkling wine that would rival Champagne. In 1972, Schramsberg's 1969 Blanc de Blancs was used for President Nixon's "Toast of Peace" with China's Premier Zhou Enlai and became a staple at official functions by every U.S. Presidential Administration since.
